
Choice Of BroadSides: HMS Foraker Download 100mb Pc

Finally, as the sun begins to set, Cordial's lost foremast is cut away, his deck is scrubbed to standard, and he is at last ready to take on a prize crew and make the long trip north to your base in Ismay.

The only question is, how large of a prize crew do you mean to put aboard her? While Foraker's crew is almost at full strength, you certainly mean to take other prizes before you return to port, and every trained gunner or top-woman assigned to keep an eye on the Cordial is another which you cannot put aboard some rich merchantwoman worth ten times a naval brig in prize money.

Then again, while the Cordial's captain has given her parole, the Columbians do possess a strong reputation for perfidy. They'd not shown much respect for the laws and customs of war when they had fought for their independence from Albion, and they have certainly shown no signs of improving their behavior in the forty years since, if their skirmishes with the pirates of Sahra or their depredations against the Gaulish were any demonstration.

Then again, perhaps you are merely worrying over nothing, and casting aspersions on the honor of a perfectly upright officer.

Perhaps.

- Assign the smallest prize crew practicable, I cannot spare more.
- Give the Cordial a moderate-sized prize crew.
- I mean to take no chances: assign as large a prize crew as possible.

Albion would have done nothing had some other nation imposed such outrages on us?" She shakes her head. "No, ladies. I say it has been long past time for us to accept that Columbia's complaint is justified, and to sue for peace. What possible good does it do for us to feed ships and regiments into this pointless sideshow when Callista Bellaroque still styles herself "Empress of the Gauls" and threatens the peace of the world with an army of nearly a million fighting women?"

"Peace will not come cheap," Lieutenant Fisher notes from the other side of your cramped dining cabin. "The Columbians have an unceasing greed for territory, that is the real reason why they started this war. They would most certainly demand our colonies to their north as compensation."

"A small price for an end to this needless distraction, surely!" Bannister answers vehemently. "What will we stand to lose save for a few acres of snow?"

"What will we stand to lose?" Fisher replies, cheeks flushed with indignation. "Our reputation! Our honor! Our security! Once it becomes known that Albion might be successfully bullied by any Harriet, Hester, or Tamsin, every nation which has ever coveted anything of ours shall know it is the hour for plunder. It may only be a few acres of snow to Columbia today, but what about tomorrow when Iberia demands the Rum Islands, or the day after that, when Zollern clamors to annex Hibernia?"

- Bannister is right: we must have peace.
- Fisher is right: Albion cannot be seen as weak.
- If discussion of politics leads to such intemperate disputes, then it must stop.

March 29th, 1813

The shot from Foraker's bow chaser smashes into the Columbian brig's foremast in a cloud of splinters. With a slow inevitability and the shriek of tortured timber, it comes down in a tangle of lines, canvas, and shattered oak.

A cheer rises from the crew as they see their quarry stricken. Beside you on the quarterdeck, your Third Lieutenant grins with evident satisfaction. "They might as well strike now and save us the trouble, Captain."

Alas, the Columbian Captain proves less than considerate in that regard. The sun and stripes of the United Republics continue to flutter stubbornly from the vessel's remaining mast. However, the Columbians' famed intransigence can make little difference now, not with one of the brig's masts shot away and a fully armed and fully crewed frigate of Albion's Royal Navy in full pursuit.

Your officers look to you expectantly for orders. The day is yours, the only question is, how do you mean to seize it?

- "Let us see if a broadside cannot convince them to strike."
- "It should be easy enough to outmaneuver them now."
- "Best we get to the point: make ready to board."
