Namdeo Dhasal's New Language

Marathi poet Namdeo Dhasal challenged Brahminical literature and sought to reconstruct a caste-less society through his works.

YOGESH MAITREYA

Marathi poet Namdeo Dhasal's works are a significant development in the world of literature broadly and in India specifically as they talk to the oppressed masses and their conscience in the language they use every day. For instance, in one of his poems called "Aishya Baddal" (About Mirror), he writes (my translation):

Why should I mock you?
Your rule is transparent
Out there
Your reflection is the only authority

The mirror, as depicted in Brahminical narratives, is the site of beauty or a metaphor for the revelation of "truth." But, in Dhasal's poems, the mirror is a site of strength, since the mirror, for him, reflects an existence that was invisibilised by caste society. The mirror accepts his existence unlike society, which rejects it. This is why his first collection of poems, Golpitha, was generalised by Brahminical writers as the aesthetics of a "fractured world." The language of Golpitha was not known to them, but their quest for hegemony in the domain of literature led them to interpret it, again, in their own language. However, Golpitha was the "rejected world" in the domain of literature, specifically, and in all aspects of life. Nevertheless, Golpitha was the arrival of the "rejected world" in the literary life of a nation. It was not only Dhasal's caste location in the urban context that was responsible for the emergence of Golpitha—a non-Brahminical, anti-caste narrative—but it was also a result of his voracious reading habits, as well as his conversion to Buddhism.

In the poems of Dhasal, words that were considered as uncouth and never given a place in the world of poetry by white-collar people have found use frequently

The movement of conversion and its impact was widely sung by Ambedkarite shahirs, who are singers or performers who use music, often accompanied by small theatrical performances that address the social life in India from an anti-caste perspective. At such a phenomenal juncture, the songs of shahirs became the epistemic base for Dalit literature. This helped Dalits "imagine the life of dignity and provided a keen sense to fight for it" by listening to shahirs before they could start reading writers. This also helped Dalit writers illustrate and offer profound meanings to objects that were either romanticised or sexualised in Brahminical narratives in Marathi. For example, in an untitled poem that appears on the back cover of Golpitha, he writes (my translation):

All the plays being staged in an experimental theatre
About our conditions
Why should we talk about betterment of mind?
While quietly being sacrificed ourselves
As if a goat during Eid?
One should live happily
Naming his life after penis,
I won't live like that.

Indira Athawale, professor of Marathi and a noted Dalit writer, has said (my translation):

> In the poems of Dhasal, words that were considered as uncouth and never given a place in the world of poetry by white-collar people have found use frequently. He does not use these words to show his different speciality, but an experience is expressed in an impactful manner through these words and, hence, he is found using these words structurally in his poems. The world he wants to describe knows this language; not only this, but it is the language of this world.

Dilip Chitre, a Brahmin writer, once referred to Dhasal as the "poor man's Bodhisattva."

The structure of oppression is seen in its entirety from below in a much more transparent way, since those who are at the bottom are at the receiving end of all forms of discrimination based on caste. So, when those at the bottom write, their language offends experts of language. Their language is looked down upon initially, but since it's a language of the masses, freshly heard by them in the domain of literature, it turns out to be in demand, ready for consumption by the Dalit Bahujans. This helps Brahmin, upper-caste publishers and critics thrive, since means of production and dissemination in the sector of literature have been monopolised by them. Dhasal's poems have always remained in demand in the field of literature. Despite all the criticism, his poems have deconstructed and consequently reconstructed the trust we place in poetry as the imagination of an equal, just, and fraternal world; fundamentally a caste-less world. He illuminates this fact in his poem, "Ambedkar 1980" (my translation):

It was Friday
Mother had eagerly bought
A book of lessons
One slate and
One pencil made of limestone
From the market.
That day she was too tired
In the light of lantern
She made me massage her feet
And then she said
"Until I fall asleep
You go through the book
I am not educated but you do one thing
Start your education
From B for Babasaheb
He was more handsome than Ganpati
That is why
Do not recite Shri-Ganesha
The head of the masses isn't an ugly person
He is one among us
